Abstract/要旨:

People, ideas and technology seem to circulate with increasing speed and across longer distances in the twenty-first century. Although globalization is often cited in attempts to make intelligible the sense of ever-closer proximity between different cultures and societies, this account reflects a Eurocentric model of diffusion from a Western core to non-Western peripheries. This workshop seeks to decentre this tunnel vision prevalent in much of contemporary social theory that ignores the role of agency and change in the Muslim world. A global social theory that draws upon the insights of Jack Goody, Sanjay Subrahmanyam and James Blaut can reveal the interconnections within the Muslim world and with other regions in the travel of people, ideas and practices.
